Outline

How is transnationalism changing contemporary Japan? After the end of the Second World War, Japan gradually lifted its isolation policy and returned to “international society.” Since then, transnational mobility and interaction have significantly enhanced, especially after entering to 21st century. While its process may differ from many European countries, Japan is going through a transnational change in its own light by shifting its characteristics from the past. Continuing from the past two workshops on “Japanese transnationalism,” this year’s theme will be a transnational change focusing on contemporary Japanese society and culture from post-war to the present. On the one hand, we would invite papers that seek the transnational process and development of Japanese society and politics. On the other hand, we would also like to explore how transnationalism has been changing Japanese culture in a broad sense. We would welcome contributions widely from social science and humanities – sociology, politics, history, communication, education, philosophy, literature, media studies, film studies, etc. From exploring empirical case studies, we aim to capture the characteristics of contemporary Japanese transnationalism and seek an alternative image of Japan that is more fluid, mobile, and diverse.

Possible topics for contribution to the workshop include, but are not limited to:

- Development and Conditions of Contemporary Japanese Transnationalism
  - Transnational (im)mobility from the post-war until the current
  - Migrants, hāfu, and returnees
  - Transnational restriction and control (citizenship, border control, etc.)
  - Transnational civil society in Post-war Japan
  - Nationalist reactions to transnational change
- Transnational Practices and Expressions of Contemporary Japanese Culture
  - Japanese transnationalism and language
  - Transnational literature / migrant literature
  - Transnational impact on Japanese social and political thoughts
  - Transnational representations in media and film
